Jane Goudge is Professor in the Centre for Health Policy in the Wits School of Public Health and has been conducting research in the field of health systems and policy research for over 25 years. She has a PhD in development economics from London University. Key themes of her work include barriers to access to care, inequities in the financing of healthcare, strategies to improve universal coverage and implementation of national health insurance in South Africa. She has developed a district learning site to support organisational change with district and facility managers.

Recent major themes in her work include public financial management, strategic purchasing and understanding how health organisations respond to austerity, the role of community health workers in bridging the gap between households and the health system, the provision of integrated chronic care, community mental-health systems, and implementation of electronic health records. Her methodological approach is predominantly qualitative, but has included pragmatic RCTs, and intervention research with realist and other evaluations. She has also established an evidence review service at the Centre.
